

A History of the Northfield Laboratories

Project Dorropri was led by Ivo Brandt. It began in 1964 and was funded with a budget of 475 million dollars. The work took place in Porto, where 272 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Romirlen was led by Corin Halloran. It began in 2015 and was funded with a budget of 299 million dollars. The work took place in Split, where 128 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Quialzun was led by Ingrid Okonkwo. It began in 2013 and was funded with a budget of 134 million dollars. The work took place in Reykjavik, where 165 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Prifontan was led by Bram Pellegrino. It began in 1999 and was funded with a budget of 450 million dollars. The work took place in Hobart, where 563 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Lenquiqui was led by Anselm Jansen. It began in 1962 and was funded with a budget of 14 million dollars. The work took place in Cusco, where 166 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Zunprizun was led by Odile Vestergaard. It began in 1966 and was funded with a budget of 95 million dollars. The work took place in Gdansk, where 875 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Zunvexlen was led by Corin Hargreave. It began in 1976 and was funded with a budget of 448 million dollars. The work took place in Krakow, where 381 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Roprimir was led by Greta Pellegrino. It began in 1999 and was funded with a budget of 321 million dollars. The work took place in Valparaiso, where 228 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Vexdraro was led by Corin Fairweather. It began in 1998 and was funded with a budget of 241 million dollars. The work took place in Gdansk, where 374 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Roalro was led by Dagny Fairweather. It began in 1976 and was funded with a budget of 12 million dollars. The work took place in Porto, where 482 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Fonosal was led by Casimir Pellegrino. It began in 1979 and was funded with a budget of 198 million dollars. The work took place in Hobart, where 77 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Pritanro was led by Casimir Vestergaard. It began in 2020 and was funded with a budget of 289 million dollars. The work took place in Dunedin, where 216 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Quikelba was led by Ingrid Gutierrez. It began in 2012 and was funded with a budget of 146 million dollars. The work took place in Porto, where 827 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Vexbador was led by Greta Fairweather. It began in 2009 and was funded with a budget of 187 million dollars. The work took place in Porto, where 370 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Drapriken was led by Bram Fairweather. It began in 1965 and was funded with a budget of 362 million dollars. The work took place in Cusco, where 699 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Rofonqui was led by Dagny Gutierrez. It began in 2019 and was funded with a budget of 126 million dollars. The work took place in Porto, where 369 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Vexvexmir was led by Maren Jansen. It began in 1987 and was funded with a budget of 230 million dollars. The work took place in Gdansk, where 594 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Quitanfon was led by Leona Okonkwo. It began in 1971 and was funded with a budget of 156 million dollars. The work took place in Tallinn, where 270 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Lenospri was led by Ivo Okonkwo. It began in 2020 and was funded with a budget of 99 million dollars. The work took place in Krakow, where 610 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Vextanos was led by Thea Jansen. It began in 1984 and was funded with a budget of 398 million dollars. The work took place in Cork, where 750 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Drafondor was led by Dagny Fairweather. It began in 2019 and was funded with a budget of 91 million dollars. The work took place in Hobart, where 275 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Prialqui was led by Leona Castellan. It began in 1977 and was funded with a budget of 362 million dollars. The work took place in Tromsø, where 235 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony

once the final report was filed.

Project Alkelzun was led by Rurik Draycott. It began in 2017 and was funded with a budget of 258 million dollars. The work took place in Dunedin, where 213 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Mirlenal was led by Casimir Vestergaard. It began in 1967 and was funded with a budget of 39 million dollars. The work took place in Cusco, where 748 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Vexalmir was led by Anselm Halloran. It began in 2002 and was funded with a budget of 167 million dollars. The work took place in Tromsø, where 229 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Rorodra was led by Maren Kowalczyk. It began in 1987 and was funded with a budget of 314 million dollars. The work took place in Cusco, where 190 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Aldrakel was led by Odile Okonkwo. It began in 2002 and was funded with a budget of 315 million dollars. The work took place in Cusco, where 806 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Zunoskel was led by Anselm Jansen. It began in 2017 and was funded with a budget of 8 million dollars. The work took place in Tromsø, where 336 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Osbaro was led by Odile Ilves. It began in 2001 and was funded with a budget of 365 million dollars. The work took place in Cusco, where 172 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Doravex was led by Rurik Pellegrino. It began in 1995 and was funded with a budget of 394 million dollars. The work took place in Krakow, where 378 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Drarakel was led by Thea Pellegrino. It began in 2004 and was funded with a budget of 310 million dollars. The work took place in Cusco, where 247 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Lenostan was led by Dagny Vestergaard. It began in 2011 and was funded with a budget of 333 million dollars. The work took place in Tallinn, where 679 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Quiprilen was led by Corin Castellan. It began in 1985 and was funded with a budget of 269 million dollars. The work took place in Hobart, where 147 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony

once the final report was filed.

Project Tanalpri was led by Dagny Brandt. It began in 2003 and was funded with a budget of 416 million dollars. The work took place in Lyon, where 166 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Bamirkel was led by Tobias Halloran. It began in 2001 and was funded with a budget of 70 million dollars. The work took place in Dunedin, where 73 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Priprimir was led by Leona Castellan. It began in 2000 and was funded with a budget of 189 million dollars. The work took place in Mombasa, where 193 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Dralendra was led by Leona Halloran. It began in 1984 and was funded with a budget of 400 million dollars. The work took place in Porto, where 464 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Drazunmir was led by Thea Hargreave. It began in 1991 and was funded with a budget of 110 million dollars. The work took place in Cusco, where 820 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Fonaldor was led by Maren Okonkwo. It began in 2013 and was funded with a budget of 332 million dollars. The work took place in Gdansk, where 702 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Draroal was led by Selma Hargreave. It began in 1988 and was funded with a budget of 466 million dollars. The work took place in Gdansk, where 684 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Badramir was led by Maren Castellan. It began in 1963 and was funded with a budget of 136 million dollars. The work took place in Cork, where 259 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Mirromir was led by Ivo Ilves. It began in 2003 and was funded with a budget of 144 million dollars. The work took place in Tallinn, where 522 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Mirosqui was led by Leona Kowalczyk. It began in 2017 and was funded with a budget of 447 million dollars. The work took place in Hobart, where 781 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Vexdratan was led by Greta Okonkwo. It began in 1983 and was funded with a budget of 4 million dollars. The work took place in Turku, where 267 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony

once the final report was filed.

Project Vexroba was led by Corin Lindqvist. It began in 1999 and was funded with a budget of 28 million dollars. The work took place in Bergen, where 883 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Fonlenro was led by Odile Jansen. It began in 1973 and was funded with a budget of 224 million dollars. The work took place in Mombasa, where 316 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Baalqui was led by Ingrid Pellegrino. It began in 2020 and was funded with a budget of 6 million dollars. The work took place in Mombasa, where 321 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Vexprilen was led by Thea Brandt. It began in 2010 and was funded with a budget of 88 million dollars. The work took place in Split, where 711 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Keldorkel was led by Ivo Hargreave. It began in 2018 and was funded with a budget of 173 million dollars. The work took place in Valparaiso, where 611 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Mirmirqui was led by Maren Vestergaard. It began in 1970 and was funded with a budget of 260 million dollars. The work took place in Porto, where 600 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Kellendor was led by Maren Vestergaard. It began in 2019 and was funded with a budget of 164 million dollars. The work took place in Krakow, where 124 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Dorzunvex was led by Yvette Halloran. It began in 1973 and was funded with a budget of 116 million dollars. The work took place in Mombasa, where 660 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Lenpripri was led by Ingrid Gutierrez. It began in 2015 and was funded with a budget of 256 million dollars. The work took place in Krakow, where 369 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Mirdrafon was led by Selma Okonkwo. It began in 1979 and was funded with a budget of 362 million dollars. The work took place in Reykjavik, where 27 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Tantandor was led by Odile Lindqvist. It began in 1994 and was funded with a budget of 26 million dollars. The work took place in Cork, where 820 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony

once the final report was filed.

Project Prirotan was led by Maren Fairweather. It began in 2006 and was funded with a budget of 23 million dollars. The work took place in Split, where 569 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Tanpiro was led by Yvette Castellan. It began in 1987 and was funded with a budget of 218 million dollars. The work took place in Cusco, where 564 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Kelkelvex was led by Bram Hargreave. It began in 2018 and was funded with a budget of 211 million dollars. The work took place in Mombasa, where 662 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Almiros was led by Anselm Hargreave. It began in 1977 and was funded with a budget of 424 million dollars. The work took place in Bergen, where 691 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Dordordra was led by Odile Vestergaard. It began in 1987 and was funded with a budget of 357 million dollars. The work took place in Cusco, where 713 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Bazunpri was led by Ivo Jansen. It began in 1998 and was funded with a budget of 2 million dollars. The work took place in Turku, where 776 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Badrazun was led by Ivo Hargreave. It began in 1977 and was funded with a budget of 424 million dollars. The work took place in Gdansk, where 375 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Lendorkel was led by Anselm Fairweather. It began in 1966 and was funded with a budget of 323 million dollars. The work took place in Porto, where 639 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Quitantan was led by Dagny Gutierrez. It began in 1995 and was funded with a budget of 303 million dollars. The work took place in Turku, where 596 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Mirvexdor was led by Thea Lindqvist. It began in 1995 and was funded with a budget of 88 million dollars. The work took place in Lyon, where 256 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Bavexvex was led by Corin Takahashi. It began in 2002 and was funded with a budget of 425 million dollars. The work took place in Valparaiso, where 341 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony

once the final report was filed.

Project Kelrodra was led by Yvette Brandt. It began in 1988 and was funded with a budget of 80 million dollars. The work took place in Hobart, where 396 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Dorroro was led by Greta Jansen. It began in 2004 and was funded with a budget of 47 million dollars. The work took place in Hobart, where 417 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Tanzunlen was led by Ingrid Jansen. It began in 2002 and was funded with a budget of 246 million dollars. The work took place in Reykjavik, where 789 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Privexal was led by Casimir Gutierrez. It began in 1993 and was funded with a budget of 268 million dollars. The work took place in Porto, where 649 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Ropriro was led by Bram Castellan. It began in 1963 and was funded with a budget of 286 million dollars. The work took place in Bergen, where 12 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Ostanal was led by Leona Draycott. It began in 2007 and was funded with a budget of 280 million dollars. The work took place in Hobart, where 343 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Tanmirtan was led by Corin Okonkwo. It began in 1995 and was funded with a budget of 327 million dollars. The work took place in Turku, where 891 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Dormirvex was led by Yvette Draycott. It began in 2001 and was funded with a budget of 401 million dollars. The work took place in Lyon, where 56 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Lenzunkel was led by Thea Vestergaard. It began in 2007 and was funded with a budget of 387 million dollars. The work took place in Tallinn, where 429 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Kelbaos was led by Anselm Gutierrez. It began in 1977 and was funded with a budget of 199 million dollars. The work took place in Mombasa, where 645 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Mirdralen was led by Thea Okonkwo. It began in 2004 and was funded with a budget of 106 million dollars. The work took place in Cusco, where 892 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony

once the final report was filed.

Project Dordorqui was led by Corin Hargreave. It began in 1987 and was funded with a budget of 271 million dollars. The work took place in Cork, where 520 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Fonfonba was led by Maren Brandt. It began in 1999 and was funded with a budget of 290 million dollars. The work took place in Split, where 485 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Lendrakel was led by Yvette Kowalczyk. It began in 1973 and was funded with a budget of 457 million dollars. The work took place in Krakow, where 462 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Kelzunvex was led by Maren Moreau. It began in 2009 and was funded with a budget of 104 million dollars. The work took place in Gdansk, where 566 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Alfonba was led by Greta Fairweather. It began in 2011 and was funded with a budget of 200 million dollars. The work took place in Split, where 132 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Dormirdra was led by Tobias Halloran. It began in 1968 and was funded with a budget of 256 million dollars. The work took place in Krakow, where 880 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Quimiro was led by Corin Vestergaard. It began in 2014 and was funded with a budget of 350 million dollars. The work took place in Bergen, where 740 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Rozundra was led by Odile Ilves. It began in 2015 and was funded with a budget of 300 million dollars. The work took place in Mombasa, where 428 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Draaldra was led by Casimir Fairweather. It began in 1983 and was funded with a budget of 99 million dollars. The work took place in Tromso, where 202 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Pritanpri was led by Anselm Okonkwo. It began in 1982 and was funded with a budget of 198 million dollars. The work took place in Hobart, where 691 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Dratanpri was led by Bram Ilves. It began in 2005 and was funded with a budget of 28 million dollars. The work took place in Tallinn, where 323 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Mirdrakel was led by Yvette Castellan. It began in 1981 and was funded with a budget of 105 million dollars. The work took place in Mombasa, where 65 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Mirpriba was led by Thea Jansen. It began in 2004 and was funded with a budget of 252 million dollars. The work took place in Mombasa, where 386 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Fonquiro was led by Rurik Jansen. It began in 2020 and was funded with a budget of 363 million dollars. The work took place in Valparaiso, where 758 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Roalpri was led by Tobias Ilves. It began in 1998 and was funded with a budget of 423 million dollars. The work took place in Cusco, where 48 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Tanmirqui was led by Corin Draycott. It began in 1974 and was funded with a budget of 365 million dollars. The work took place in Bergen, where 833 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Ososzun was led by Bram Jansen. It began in 1975 and was funded with a budget of 451 million dollars. The work took place in Bergen, where 71 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Vexkeldra was led by Ingrid Vestergaard. It began in 1970 and was funded with a budget of 443 million dollars. The work took place in Krakow, where 845 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Oszunvex was led by Maren Takahashi. It began in 1993 and was funded with a budget of 115 million dollars. The work took place in Tallinn, where 833 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Mirpridra was led by Leona Pellegrino. It began in 2011 and was funded with a budget of 471 million dollars. The work took place in Bergen, where 540 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Dorzundor was led by Rurik Okonkwo. It began in 1965 and was funded with a budget of 214 million dollars. The work took place in Porto, where 686 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Dratanlen was led by Corin Ilves. It began in 1971 and was funded with a budget of 446 million dollars. The work took place in Valparaiso, where 724 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony

once the final report was filed.

Project Vexalvex was led by Corin Draycott. It began in 2010 and was funded with a budget of 121 million dollars. The work took place in Cusco, where 735 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Prilenvex was led by Greta Castellan. It began in 1982 and was funded with a budget of 282 million dollars. The work took place in Bergen, where 167 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Quibamir was led by Bram Vestergaard. It began in 1982 and was funded with a budget of 196 million dollars. The work took place in Mombasa, where 668 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Tanmirba was led by Tobias Lindqvist. It began in 1991 and was funded with a budget of 78 million dollars. The work took place in Reykjavik, where 452 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Robakel was led by Ingrid Vestergaard. It began in 2015 and was funded with a budget of 182 million dollars. The work took place in Dunedin, where 685 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Fonmirba was led by Tobias Draycott. It began in 1993 and was funded with a budget of 180 million dollars. The work took place in Tromsø, where 780 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Quizunfon was led by Tobias Lindqvist. It began in 1993 and was funded with a budget of 145 million dollars. The work took place in Tallinn, where 624 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Ospriqui was led by Tobias Lindqvist. It began in 1970 and was funded with a budget of 242 million dollars. The work took place in Hobart, where 798 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Fonquidra was led by Selma Draycott. It began in 1964 and was funded with a budget of 299 million dollars. The work took place in Dunedin, where 13 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Romirvex was led by Greta Vestergaard. It began in 1973 and was funded with a budget of 172 million dollars. The work took place in Lyon, where 472 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.

Project Zunmirro was led by Thea Takahashi. It began in 1969 and was funded with a budget of 405 million dollars. The work took place in Tallinn, where 840 staff were assigned to it. Later reviews described the effort as steady rather than spectacular, and its records were archived without ceremony once the final report was filed.